ABOUT THE AUTHOR

DR ROSE SHAYO is a senior lecturer and has for the past 25 years been working with the Institute of Development Studies (IDS) based at the University of Dar es Salaam. She is convenor of the IDS Women's Studies Group and chairperson of the Tanzanian Chapter of Women, Law and Development (WilDAF). She has undertaken research and published several papers and articles on various development issues, including women and politics, gender and technology, gender and employment, gender and higher education, gender and poverty. Some of her published articles have included, Women's participation in elective politics in Tanzania: Problems, prospects and challenges, REDET Report 8, 2001; Gender and employment sector reforms in Tanzania, IDS Journal 5(2), 2004; Alternative technologies available for women in Africa, Women's Encyclopaedia 7, 2004; and The march towards gender equality in higher learning institutions: The case of the UDSM, IDS Journal 5(5), 2004. Dr Shayo has also been active as a local and international consultant on various gender training programmes dealing with gender mainstreaming, budgeting and planning.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The successful completion of this study was made possible with the support of many people, particularly key officials in the parties that were studied as well as colleagues at the University of Dar es Salaam. My thanks go to, among others, those party leaders who created an environment conducive to people's involvement. We were able to make courtesy calls to the leaders of the Civic United Front (CUF), Chama cha Demokrasia na Maendeleo (Chadema) and the Tanzania Labour Party (TLP). Special acknowledgements are extended to the party officials who responded directly to the questionnaires, including: Mr Chisi, Chama cha Mapinduzi (CCM); Richard Hiza Tambwe (CUF); Hamad Rajab Tao (TLP); Wilbroad Slaa (Chadema); Mr Tendwa (Registrar of Parties in Tanzania); the chairperson of the CCM's youth wing; and Ms Janet Kahama, (chairperson of UWT-CCM Dar es Salaam region). Special thanks go to my colleagues at the Institute of Development Studies who provided constructive information on the functioning of parties, including Professor B. Koda, Dr S. Sinda, Dr R. Mhamba and Professor I. Shao. Ms S. Joyceline and Mr B. Salema are thanked for their support during the process of collecting the information used in preparing this paper, and Judith Stephen is thanked for her word-processing services.

PREFACE

Multiparty democracy is becoming increasingly entrenched in the Southern African Development Community (SADC) region. A few SADC member states, including Botswana and Mauritius, boast long-enduring multiparty political systems implemented since their independence. Others have experienced a variety of mono-party systems (Angola, the Democratic Republic of Congo [DRC], Lesotho, Malawi, Mozambique, Tanzania, Zambia and Zimbabwe), military dictatorship (Lesotho), apartheid rule (Namibia and South Africa) or no-party dynastic regimes (Swaziland).

Since the 1990s, most SADC countries (barring Angola, the DRC and Swaziland) have undergone a phenomenal transition towards multiparty politics. Crucial as this political transition is, its exact impact on democracy remains a moot point. In both the academic and policy discourses today, a number of questions still require answers. For example:

- Has the current political transition enhanced democratic governance?
- Has the transition deepened democratic culture and practice?
- Has the transition improved the effectiveness of democratic institutions such as political parties?

EISA (formerly the Electoral Institute of Southern Africa) – under the theme ‘Consolidating democratic governance in the SADC region’ – is therefore undertaking a broad programme that attempts to answer these questions.

The first stage of the programme focused on political parties and attempted to answer whether the transition improved the effectiveness of democratic institutions, such as political parties. This component of the programme was undertaken jointly by EISA and the International Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance (IDEA) between 2003 and 2004. It investigated the state of political parties in the democratisation process in the SADC region over the past decade. The main goal of the programme was to assess the role and effectiveness of political parties in the process of institutionalisation of democratic governance in each of the SADC countries. The specific objectives of the project were to:

- assess the general political and socio-economic context of each country and its possible impact on political parties;
- investigate the external regulatory and legislative environment in each country and its impact on the role and functions of political parties; and
- examine the internal functioning and structure of political parties and the impact of this on their institutional effectiveness.

There is no gainsaying that political parties play a critical role in the democratisation process. It is also incontrovertible that political parties are key to the institutionalisation and consolidation of democracy. Thus, sustainable democracy is dependent upon well-functioning and effective political parties. Each country context suggests that vibrant and robust political parties are crucial actors in articulating and aggregating diverse interests, providing visionary political leadership, recruiting and presenting candidates, and developing competing political and policy programmes upon which the electorate base their choices during elections.

Democracy is unthinkable without political parties and, conversely, political parties cannot add value to a political system under conditions of authoritarianism. Parties everywhere have the potential to be effective and accountable, but they face enormous challenges. The political context and the legal environment in which they function, as well as their systems of internal organisation, management and operation, require attention and are often in need of reform.

Although little comparative research has been conducted, it is clear that the external environment – the regulatory, financial, political and electoral spheres in which political parties grow and function – influences parties' strategies and organisation. The external environment also has a fundamental impact on the capacity of parties to become more effective agents of democratisation.

The internal functioning of political parties determines how the social demands of different groups in society are represented in parliament. Candidates nominated for election are selected, supported and trained by their parties. In addition, parties put candidates in touch with voters and hold them accountable. In many instances, the electoral and political culture and associated structures have allowed traditionally excluded groups – such as women, ethnic and religious minorities, indigenous peoples and youth – to have only limited access to the political realm.

To address these issues, EISA and IDEA developed three questionnaires on: the country context; the external regulations and environment; and the internal functioning and structure of political parties. Country studies were undertaken by experts commissioned by EISA and IDEA. One of the main outputs of this project is a series of research reports, and this report forms an integral part of the series.

We extend our profound gratitude to the Swedish International Development Agency in Harare, Zimbabwe, the Royal Danish Embassy in Pretoria, South Africa and the Embassy of Finland in Pretoria, South Africa for their generous financial support, without which this programme would not have been possible.

We are also grateful to the following people who have played a crucial role at various stages of the project: Denis Kadima, EISA executive director; Abdalla Hamdok, director, IDEA Africa Regional Office; Julie Ballington, IDEA programme officer; Roger Hallhag, IDEA head, political parties; Per Nordlund, IDEA senior programme officer; Francesca Binda, IDEA, senior advisor, political parties; Claude Kabemba, EISA programme manager, research; Jackie Kalley, EISA publications officer; Grant Masterson, EISA research fellow; Sydney Letsholo, EISA research assistant; Maureen Moloji, EISA research intern; Selby Matloga, EISA research intern; and Nkgakong Mokonyane, EISA assistant programme administrator. We acknowledge the sterling effort they invested in the project.

Thanks are also due to the party leaders who were interviewed and gave generously of their time. Last but not least, we would like to thank Dr Rose Shayo for her insightful contribution to this programme.

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

This report presents findings from a study conducted in Tanzania for the EISA project on 'Strengthening democracy through dialogue with parties'. The overall aims of this project are to examine the functioning and regulation of parties in Tanzania during the multiparty era, and to identify best practices in relation to the functioning of parties in Southern Africa. The report provides comparative information on various aspects that were raised, including party formation, membership, policy development and relations within and between parties, as well as constraints and challenges facing parties when it comes to practising effective democracy.

Information presented in this report was obtained from primary and secondary sources. The former involved in-depth interviews with key leaders of the four parties included in the survey, namely, Chama cha Mapinduzi (CCM), the Civic United Front (CUF), Chama cha Demokrasia na Maendeleo (Chadema) and the Tanzania Labour Party (TLP).

Except for the CCM ruling party, the parties surveyed were established in the early 1990s after the reintroduction of multiparty politics in Tanzania. Multiparty politics existed in the pre-independence period (1961), but was abolished in 1965, leaving the country as a one-party state. Since the resumption of multiparty politics, there have been almost 100 attempts to establish parties. Owing to the strict regulations, however, only 17 of these had been registered at the time of writing, and of these only the four included in this study are active and have genuine and wide coverage throughout the country (that is, from national to grassroots levels).

It is evident from the findings that all four parties surveyed have well-designed legal documents (party constitutions, policy documents and election manifestos) for regulating their functioning. For instance, each party's constitution, although written and formatted in different styles, covers the party's objectives, membership (rights and duties) and meetings and organs, from national to grassroots levels. Most constitutions have remained unchanged for many years, but the CUF's was revised after 10 years, in 2003. The parties have clear processes and procedures for nominating leaders. These vary from party to party and depend on the positions in question and the party's financial stability. There are also differences with respect to the nomination of candidates seeking election to positions both within and outside their own parties. Generally, the parties emphasise age, membership status, academic qualifications and the support from members required by the law. Although there are remarkable differences regarding the interpretation of these basic qualifications, it became evident that the parties' respective national executives or governing councils approve the names of all presidential and parliamentary candidates.

All four parties reported having leaders elected through party meetings and by society at large – both proceeded by election campaigns. Although most elections have been smooth, there have been many petitions against certain election irregularities as well as allegations of corruption.

Members generally have the right to participate in all political activities within their parties. However, some members, such as civil servants, are not allowed to take an active part in politics, including holding key leadership positions, especially in opposition.

The survey findings established that parties adopted both top-down and bottom-up approaches in dealing with various aspects related to the functioning of their parties.

Party membership is generally broadly inclusive. Parties prepare gender data mainly for internal purposes, but are not allowed to form parties on the basis of sex, class, ethnicity or religion. Owing to the continuous movement of members both within and across parties it was not possible to establish the actual number of members of the various parties.

Most respondents were not willing to disclose information on issues related to finances. Except for the ruling party, most parties do not have adequate funds or assets.

Most opposition parties indicated that they are experiencing several problems and challenges. Some of our recommendations include the need to:

- improve the quality of opposition parties, particularly in relation to their internal functioning;

- create neutral political institutions to deal with constant conflicts within and between parties;
- establish a fair playing field by laying down sound financial policies with clear information that requires parties to disclose the sources of their funds and donations, and the details of their campaign spending;
- design gender-sensitive strategies for addressing gender issues within parties, including both quantitative and qualitative aspects; and
- organise periodic meetings to generate debate on issues related to the functioning of parties, as well as to establish and share information on best practices.

INTRODUCTION

This report presents findings from a study undertaken to examine the functioning of political parties in Tanzania and the regulations that govern them. The study aimed to get a full picture across the 13 Southern African Development Community (SADC) countries regarding various aspects affecting parties and democracy, including external regulations governing the parties, parties' internal functioning and other socio-economic aspects.

The individual country studies were undertaken to obtain comparative data and to help to identify best practices in the region that might serve as examples to countries wishing to engage in political reform. The findings are expected to promote informed and constructive debate that will, it is hoped, lead to an environment in which parties in the SADC region can grow, flourish and compete.

The study was conducted on four parties, namely the ruling CCM and three opposition parties – the CUF, the TLP and Chadema. These parties were chosen because they have members in the Union Parliament on the Mainland or in the House of Representative in Zanzibar, or both. The findings are presented in a format prescribed by the study organisers, EISA.

The overall objective of this study is to examine patterns and trends during the multiparty era in the subject areas being studied. In order to accomplish the above task, the following specific objectives were pursued, namely, to examine:

- various issues related to the formation of parties, including the year of establishment and the reasons for their establishment, the interest groups served, and the parties' internal relations;
- party structures, as well as the election of party leaders;
- the various processes and procedures parties follow in formulating their policies and programmes;
- issues related to party membership;
- the processes and procedures parties use to nominate candidates to various positions, such as the country's presidency and MPs;

- parties' external relations, including their local and international contacts; and
- funding arrangements, including membership fees, funding of campaigns, support for regional branches, income, fundraising strategies, party assets and patterns of expenditures within and among parties.

RESEARCH METHODOLOGY

EISA provided researchers with a detailed questionnaire (see appendices) containing information on the methodology to be observed by researchers participating in the project.

The data and information presented in this report were obtained from both secondary and primary sources. The main secondary sources include published and unpublished information available from the University of Dar es Salaam main library, the Research and Education for Democracy in Tanzania (Redet) Programme, the Tanzanian government and the various parties studied.

Primary sources of information came from the questionnaires that were to be completed by key people in each party, including the chairperson, the secretary, the treasurer, the information officer and representatives dealing with specific issues, such as women's and youth policies and programmes.

During field surveys it was not possible to find all these people for each party. In these circumstances, researchers were expected to complement information from primary sources with secondary data and information available from both government and non-governmental organisations (NGOs).

The four parties selected from the country's 16 registered parties were included because they all have representatives in the Union Parliament or House of Representatives or because they participated in the 1995 or 2000 presidential elections. The selection criteria were:

- Number of representatives in Union Parliament and House of Representatives: All the selected parties have representatives in the Union Parliament and House of Representatives. In the first and second multiparty election in 1995 and 2000, the CCM had the largest number of seats, with 185 and 202 MPs respectively. The CUF had 24 MPs in 1995 and 17 in 2000. Chadema had 3 MPs in 1995 and 4 in 2000. The TLP had no MPs in 1995 and 4 in 2000.

- Participation in presidential elections: All the parties except Chadema participated in the 1995 and 2000 presidential elections. The parties nominated the same candidates for both terms – Mr Mkapa was the CCM’s nominee, Prof Lipumba was the CUF’s nominee and Mr Mrema was the TLP’s nominee.
- Party histories: The ruling party (the CCM) was formed more than 28 years ago and has not split or merged with other parties, while its top leadership has remained solid and united. In the TLP and Chadema there have been leadership changes. Indeed, the TLP was formed from nearly all the members of another party, NCCR-Mageuzi, when they left that party with their leader, Mr Mrema, after a conflict of interest.

The table summarises the designations and genders of the respondents involved in the study.

Table 1: Respondents and party affiliations

Party	Designation	Sex	Total
CCM	Director of Information	M	One
UVCCM	Directors of Information and Policy Development	M	Two
Chadema	Secretary-general	M	One
CUF	Secretary-general	M	One

We could not interview party chairpersons, as they were all involved with various party activities. They did, however, delegate their responsibilities to other key officials.

Four difficulties or limitations were encountered in the process of collecting information for this report, namely:

- There were complaints from respondents on the way the study had been formulated. They were concerned about the study's top-down approach. The questionnaires were, however, prepared by EISA/IDEA, which asked the country researchers to complete them as they were. In view of this, some of the sensitive questions about funding and sources of funding were not answered as respondents found these 'too demanding'.
- Respondents also complained that the questionnaires were too long and too detailed. Most respondents said that they were too busy with party activities to do justice to the questionnaires.
- Respondents found it difficult to keep their appointments with us, and in each case we had to arrange three or more sessions for all the issues in the questionnaire to be discussed. In all, the researchers needed seven trips to complete the questionnaires.
- Information from party reports and data on sensitive issues such as membership was difficult to obtain from all the parties.

SOCIO-ECONOMIC CONTEXT

When Tanzania became independent, it was among the poorest countries in the world. The situation became worse from the mid-1970s to the late-1980s, when Tanzania went through severe economic crises, prompted externally by the 1973 OPEC oil price hikes and exacerbated by a deterioration in Tanzania's balance of payments from 1977, the war with Uganda in 1978 and the second oil price hike in 1979. Domestic conditions were no better. In addition, the protective, inward-looking import substitution policies discouraged export expansion and stifled competition both politically and economically.

These crises adversely affected the economy and were manifested in huge balance of payment deficits, high inflation rates, a huge external debt, stagnant and sometimes negative per capita gross domestic product (GDP) growth, and a general lack of basic consumer goods. Attempts to resolve the crisis led the Tanzanian government to sign agreements in 1986 with the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund. After the crises of the 1970s and 1980s, the economy has been slowly recovering, largely due to liberalisation and structural adjustment policies. Domestic inflation, which had averaged 25% between 1986 and 1994, fell to 11% by June 1998 and to single digit levels from 1999.

Today, achievements in macro-economic stability have included increased official and private capital inflows and improved foreign capital reserves. Gross official reserves were up by one-third from US$1,529 million in 2002 to US$2,038 million in 2003 – equivalent to 8.9 months of imports of goods and services. Growth in GDP has averaged 5.4% a year over the past five years, or considerably higher than the average for African countries.¹ The improved performance of Tanzania's economy is the result of the structural reforms that the government has consistently pursued over the past 11 years.

It has been a substantial achievement indeed, with the manufacturing and construction sectors growing by impressive annual rates of more than 8% and 11% respectively – the latter in the wake of primary education development and road construction programmes. While the rate of capital investment increased from 14.7% to 18.5% of GDP between 1997 and 2003, this is still too low for economic development to accelerate effectively. As a result of tax reforms and greater administrative efficiency, there has also been a significant increase in revenue collections – from an average of some Tsh25 billion a month in the early-1990s to Tsh108 billion a month in 2003/4.

These achievements have facilitated the servicing of external debt, the development of financial markets and improvements to the money supply, credit facilities and export levels. They have also led to the reopening of enterprises that had closed before privatisation, an increase in the quantity and quality of goods and services, increased tax revenue from privatised businesses, increases in employment and a strengthening of the education and health environment.

POLITICAL DEVELOPMENT AND DEMOCRATISATION

Tanzania had been a multiparty state from before independence until 1965, when the decision to establish a single-party state was implemented. In recent times, political development has gone hand in hand with socio-economic development, with the most significant feature being the establishment of multiparty democracy in the early-1990s that culminated in the first multiparty election in 1995.

We call it a political development because it was attained after a nationwide debate and referendum at which the people voted for the best course of action. Politicians (including the late President Nyerere), elites and the media were all involved in educating the masses on the need to shift from one-party to multiparty politics. Although 80% of those voting remained in favour of single-party rule, with only 20% preferring a multiparty democracy, the decision was taken to go for the latter. The political development for Tanzania was that the minority view should prevail as the politicians accepted that a change to multiparty politics was in the country's best interests.

However, this change took place when the ruling party and the government retained both political and economic power. As a result, there was no immediate redistribution of national resources in favour of newly emerging parties. The opposition therefore remained weak until some senior members of the CCM started breaking away from their party to join the opposition forces. Today, therefore, the CCM and other parties may remain the same de jure but not de facto. Resources, however, are still not being allocated equally, and this has allowed the CCM – in the same way as ruling parties in other countries – to continue to retain its power.

At the same time, the CCM has broadened the democracy by permitting – in line with President Mkapa's credo of 'openness, transparency and accountability' – the rise of private media, independent journalism and almost unlimited freedom of speech and of the press. Other key players, such as the trade unions and civil society, have been able to become involved in the process, as they are no longer subject to an authoritarian government.

Since Tanzania adopted multiparty politics, several social groups have played decisive roles in achieving broader democratic participation. These have included student and youth groups, political, human rights and women's organisations, and the church. Firm leadership has strengthened the favourable political climate. Perhaps the only weakness has been that the progressive sector of the country's society operates predominantly at present in the capital cities, with the rest of the country and the rural population having been almost forgotten.

While cases of electoral corruption have occasionally been reported, these have mainly involved individuals, and not the CCM as the ruling party.

DEMOCRATISATION WITHIN PARTIES

Inevitably, the degree of democratisation within parties depends on the freedom, openness, accountability and above all ethics that bind the members into one responsible organ. From the grassroots there are party organs through which every member has a right to participate and air his or her views, right up to the apex of the party at the national level, where major decisions are made.

There is a participative democracy within the ruling party that permits opposing views. Occasionally, this is quite different from what happens when the word of the party chairperson is all that matters.

The ruling party's encouragement of democracy within its ranks has been for a real reason and not 'just for the sake of it'. The party in power has welcomed alternative approaches and different points of view on the management of resources and the economy generally in order to create improved conditions for the people. The success of this approach can be seen in the country's dramatic economic improvement. The party's altruistic-sounding agenda has included opening the doors to broad citizenship rights – including the right to life and the right to a minimum income – as well as giving attention to questions such as redistribution and control of ownership, resources and powers, and working towards gender equality.

CONTEMPORARY HISTORY OF POLITICAL PARTIES AND PARTY SYSTEMS

The contemporary history of multiparty politics in Tanzania can be traced back to the early 1990s, when Tanzania's first president, the late Mwalimu Julius Kambarage Nyerere, introduced the idea of reinstating a multiparty system in the country. According to Mmuya and Chaligha,² President Nyerere called a press conference in February 1990 and announced that it was not treasonable to debate multiparty politics in Tanzania. Moreover, he challenged Tanzanians to start thinking about the relevance of retaining a single-party system: 'The single party is not a religious dogma that was never to be tampered with,' he said. The National Executive Committee of the CCM, under his chairmanship, endorsed his proposals and sanctioned a national debate on multiparty politics in Tanzania.

A commission under the chairmanship of Chief Justice Francis Nyalali was formed to gauge public opinion on the reintroduction of multiparty politics. Msekwa³ reports that Tanzania officially became a multiparty state in 1992 and the constitution was amended after 30 years of one-party politics to accommodate the new changes. According to Ngware,⁴ however, the ruling CCM has continued to exercise an almost exclusive monopoly of power and authority, even though 12 parties were formally registered between 1992 and 2001. Indeed, Chachage⁵ argues that by 1994, 43 parties applied for provisional registration but only 13 managed to get full registration. Likewise, five parties were formed between 2002 and 2005.

It is pertinent to note that the majority of members of opposition parties came from the ruling party (the CCM), including the leaders of various parties. Thus, it is proper to indicate that most opposition parties are splinter groups from the pre-multiparty period. According to Malyamkono⁶ after the reintroduction of multiparty politics, most people started to challenge the supremacy of the ruling party. In this respect, although the CCM was very strong as an institution it began to lose support from the people, thus providing space for the creation of new parties. Nevertheless, very few of these parties have gained broad-based support, particularly at grassroots levels. This is clearly reflected in the location of their head offices. All the parties except for the ruling party (the CCM) have their head offices in Dar es Salaam city. The head office for the ruling party (the CCM) is in Dodoma, which is the capital city of Tanzania. Between 1993 and 2004, 16 parties had achieved full registration. Table 2 summarises details of registered parties in Tanzania in 2005.

Source: Registrar of parties in Tanzania, November 2005

It will be seen that the first 11 parties were formed immediately after the introduction of multiparty politics, while the others were formed in the past five years. Parties in the later category include Demokrasia Makini, Chausta, and Forum for the Restoration of Democracy (Ford), the Democratic Party (DP), Progressive Party of Tanzania (PPT)-Maendeleo, and Jahazi Asilia.

Parties from the days of pre-multiparty politics, including the ruling CCM, have a history dating back to soon after the attainment of political independence in 1961. The CCM has a strong ideology base and a strong national grassroots identity. It has a firm and sustainable organisational structure and continues to gain support.

Later parties, which are in opposition, can be divided into those formed between 1992 and 2000 and parties formed more recently.

EXTERNAL REGULATIONS AND ENVIRONMENT

LEGISLATION GOVERNING THE FORMATION OF PARTIES

This is detailed in a 1992 government notice, titled Party Registration – popularly known as the Regulations – which includes information on:

- conditions for applying for temporary registration;
- processes and procedures for applying for full registration;
- office-bearers and changes in office-bearers;
- changes in the location of a party's head office or postal address;
- changes to the name or status of a party – including becoming a member or affiliate of another party or organisation located outside the country, or applying for deregistration;
- changes to a party's constitution;
- name changes – generally, parties may not use identical names or names that resemble those of existing parties or that are likely to confuse members of the public;
- records of funds and sources of funds;
- notices, returns and reports; and
- offences and penalties.

The Registrar of Parties may refuse to register a party, but if s/he does so s/he must give reasons for this.

REGULATORY FRAMEWORK FOR INTERNAL PARTY FUNCTIONS

On paper, most parties have frameworks and policies that allow for internal democracy in all-important matters, including party organs, selection of candidates and settlement of disputes.

CCM

The ruling party has well-designed and elaborate regulations governing almost every aspect of the party. These are contained in the party's constitution and in its Party Guidelines document, and include:

- the name, objectives and aims of the party;
- membership and leadership, including founding members,

- new members, conditions for joining the party, training of new members, membership contributions, annual fees, resignation from party membership and membership rights and obligations;
- party meetings from branch to national level, the latter including:
 - the National Congress;
 - the National Executive Committee (NEC) and its secretariat; and
 - the Central Committee (CC) of the NEC;
 - responsibilities of the CC, including:
 - providing general political guidance;
 - overseeing the implementation of party activities at all levels;
 - spreading the policy of the CCM throughout the country;
 - monitoring the implementation of party elections; and
 - electing district party secretaries.

During presidential elections, the CC also deals with:

- nominations of and recommendations for party members for the positions of chairperson and deputy chairperson of the party;
- nominations for the president of Tanzania;
- nominations of party members for MPs and members of the House of Representatives;
- disciplinary actions against all party members except the party's chairperson and deputy chairperson; and
- issues relating to national security and development.

CUF

The comprehensive constitution of the CUF was formulated immediately after the party's establishment in 1993 and revised 10 years later. It regulates the internal functioning of the party, which was created by Shariff Hamad, a former Zanzibar chief minister in the CCM government. It has a strong base both in Zanzibar and on the Mainland. The party was formed after a pressure group from the Mainland, Chama cha Wananchi, united with Kamahuru from Zanzibar at a meeting that was held at the Institute of Finance and Management in Dar es Salaam.

The CUF is a liberal party and a member of Liberal International and African Liberal networks. The party was established with the intention of improving the wellbeing of all Tanzanians with respect to socio-economic and political matters.

To be more precise, the party is committed to addressing the needs, interests and priorities of low-income people, particularly in the informal sector (the so-called Wabangaizaji). The party works closely with people of all walks of life and has become known as a 'people's party'.

The CUF's constitution and operational guidelines are similar to those of the CCM. Its General Governing Council (GGC), which is its national organ, governs the party and meets on a quarterly basis.

A total of 45 members of the GGC (i.e. 25 from the Mainland and 20 from Zanzibar) are elected by delegates to the party's general congress, which meets every two-and-a-half years. Congress delegates, who are required to pay a registration fee of Tsh500, are drawn from regional and local party branches and other affiliates, such as youth and women's wings. Delegates receive allowances but not salaries. Decisions taken by the congress need to be ratified by the GGC, which is the party's highest decision-making body.

The party's constitution also gives guidance on the formation of party branches, for which a membership of 50 is required.

Chadema

This was one of the first opposition parties in Tanzania. A former Minister of Finance in the CCM government, Mr Edwin Mtei, established Chadema in 1993. Since its inception, Chadema has provided strong opposition because it has a clear programme of activities from national to grassroots levels. Unlike other strong parties, such as the TLP and National Convention for Construction and Reform (NCCR-Mageuzi), Chadema has undergone no split in its ranks and has retained both its original name and its membership integrity. The party is considered to have a centre-right alignment.

Similar to the CUF, Chadema sees its role as fighting for the rights of low-income urban and rural people. It believes that the people's low level of development can be transformed by the power of the people in the private sector of the country's economy. The party's leaders are campaigning for good economic governance and attacking the misappropriation of public goods and services by the ruling party. They believe that all the country's social groups – from the elite to the business community and the peasants – can combine to create 'peoples power'.

Chadema's constitution includes clear operational guidelines on membership and financial issues, and on the formation and roles of party organs from national to branch levels. The constitution contains procedures for the selection of members of its National Governing Council (NGC), which meets every five years, as well as for the selection of candidates for MPs and for membership of regional and district branches and the party wings for women, youth and people with disabilities. Lower-level bodies elect most of the party leadership in a bottom-up approach, while higher-level bodies elect the directors of various departments. The party also has a code of ethnics for its members and officials.

While Chadema has no formal internal quotas for women or youth, 37% of the members of the NGC are women and almost 23% are youth members. NGC members receive no salaries but are paid subsistence allowances whenever they attend meetings. If available, allowances are also paid at district and regional levels, but again no salaries.

The next highest organ of the party is the NEC, whose members are elected by national, regional and district congresses, as well as by women's and youth wings at regional and district levels. A further 12 members are appointed by the party's national chairperson, half from the Mainland and half from Zanzibar, with six of the members being women or youth members.

The party's structure includes some 25,000 sub-branches – each with at least eight members living in a sub-village – and 8,000 branches – each made up of several sub-branches. There are also 130 district branches and several women's and youth wings throughout the country, as well as regional branches for each of Tanzania's 26 regions, five of which are in Zanzibar.

A representative from a district branch supervises the choice of the leader of a sub-branch. Party members are required to pay a total of TSh500 as annual and subscription fees.

Overall observations

In practice, parties have adopted both top-down and bottom-up approaches in addressing various issues related to the functioning of their parties. Consciously or unconsciously, however, most party leaders have created organisational structures that tend to concentrate power at the top levels, with most decisions handed down to the lower party levels. The chairperson is usually the senior party officer.

The three parties that provided us with information on the subject told us that their parties were all managed by national governing councils, differing only in the details of their structure, size, operation and frequency of meetings.

REGISTRATION OF PARTIES

The 1992 Parties (Registration) Regulations provides detailed information on the processes and procedures to be followed by individuals or groups interested in establishing political parties. Registration is normally in provisional and full stages, and requires copies of constitutions, rules and names and other details of two founding members.

Prospective parties are required to pay the Registrar of Parties' fee, after which, to achieve full registration, they are required to:

- have at least 200 members aged above 18 years;
- have support from at least 10 regions, two of which must be from Zanzibar and Pemba;
- submit the names of their parties' national leaders, one from the Mainland and the other from Zanzibar; and
- provide proper addresses for the national party offices, including the physical location and the postal addresses of their head offices

NOMINATION OF CANDIDATES FOR ELECTIONS

The presidency

Table 3 summarises the qualifications for party candidates for the country's presidency. As will be noted, these are virtually identical for all the parties.

PROCESSES FOR SELECTING PARTY CANDIDATES FOR PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS

CCM

On 10 February 2005, 11 members of the CCM, the ruling party, who were eligible to stand for the presidency, were invited to collect application forms from the party secretary-general. They were then given two months (up to 15 April) to collect at least 25 signatories from 10 regions in Tanzania, including two regions in Zanzibar and Pemba, in order to establish the extent to which party members throughout the country accept each prospective candidate. After the prospective candidates returned their forms to the secretary-general, a confidential meeting was held by the party's national secretariat, which forwarded its technical recommendations to the ethics committee, which then scrutinised and discussed the qualities of each prospective candidate on the basis of prescribed parameters. The ethics committee then forwarded a shortlist of five names to the party's central committee, which after further discussion forwarded its three preferred names to the party's national congress, attended by some 1,500 members from all 26 of the country's districts. The congress used the three-vote system (kura tatu) to declare the name of the winning candidate by a majority of the votes.

CUF

Aspiring candidates from this party similarly collect application forms, which they submit to the party secretaries in the districts where they have permanent residence. The district executive committees then scrutinise the forms and forward them for discussion first by the NEC and then by the party's general congress, after which one name is selected by a simple majority in a secret ballot as the party's presidential candidate. This candidate then recommends the name of his or her running mate as vice-president to the party's central committee.

Chadema

The party's central committee provides forms for assisting party members to elect party leaders, including its candidate for the presidency. There is a timetable for the collection and submission of the forms after these have been filled in. The selection process begins with district and national executive committees, and their recommendations are normally endorsed by the party's national congress. Chadema has introduced a system of giving unsuccessful candidates reasons for their not having been selected.

TLP

Any member aspiring for the presidency must meet the conditions laid down by the party and complete the required forms. The central committee then discusses the qualities of each of the would-be candidates and approves the name of one candidate to stand for the presidency.

Candidates for other offices

All the party constitutions lay down procedures for electing leaders to various positions within their parties, such as:

- national leaders, including party chairpersons and vice-chairpersons;

- party secretaries and treasurers;
- heads of various party organs and committees; and
- regional, district, ward, branch and sub-branch officers.

For leadership positions within a party, similar qualities and procedures generally apply, as in the case of aspirant candidates for the country's presidency. These include diligence, commitment and adherence to party guidelines. For members to become party leaders, sex, colour, ethnicity, class, age or place of residence provide no disqualification. Equality within parties is emphasised by the use of the word 'comrade' (ndugu) as the common form of address, although some honorific, such as 'honourable', 'professor' or 'bishop' are gaining currency.

ELECTION CAMPAIGNS AND OBSERVATION

Party leaders are elected through party meetings, while the leadership usually appoints administrators. Parties' national congresses elect all national leaders. While details may differ, political campaigns are a common feature of all parties. These serve two purposes – to advertise a party's policies and to assess the personal attributes and leadership qualities of the various aspirants.

There are today considerable differences compared with the one-party era, when, for example, there was only one candidate for the country's presidency and the voters could vote only 'yes' or 'no', or not vote at all.

Except in 1995, elections in the multiparty era have gone smoothly, although there have been various petitions to contest some parliamentary results. There is stiff competition among parties, and charges of corruption against MPs and councillors during the campaign process are quite common.

INTERNAL FUNCTIONING AND STRUCTURE

POLICY DEVELOPMENT

Most parties make use of departmental heads to draft policy papers, which then go to the party secretariats for discussion and improvement. Revised policy proposal documents are then forwarded to the central committees for further deliberations, after which they go up to the parties' highest decision-making organs for final approval and endorsement.

The overall policy statements of all the parties surveyed were very similar. All parties expressed commitment to the development of a strong economic and political base that is both self-sustaining and responsive to the needs of the majority of the country's people, particularly the poor and marginalised groups.

OPINION SURVEYS

The CCM, Chadema and the TLP have access to their own opinion survey resources as well as to public resources – which include institutions such as Redet for which they are not required to pay insofar as the research is related to the parties' activities. All three parties also poll their own members' opinions.

IMPLEMENTATION OF POLICY DECISION DIRECTIVES

All parties noted that they were required to operate within the approved policies of their parties, and that any leaders or members who are in violation of party decisions or rules were subject to disciplinary proceedings involving ethics or advisory boards or committees at all levels of the party structures.

MEMBERSHIP AND RECRUITMENT

The CCM, Chadema and the TLP indicated that they maintained membership registers at the branch level, and that reports on membership were submitted to the party head offices at the national level. There were, however, difficulties in quoting actual numbers because the figures were continually fluctuating.

Nevertheless, the secretary-general of Chadema indicated that at the time of the survey his party had about 850,000 members on the Mainland and in Zanzibar. This included a membership drive during which no fewer than half a million new members were recruited during 2004 in preparation for the forthcoming election in October 2005.

Similarly, the secretary-general for the TLP reported that his party's membership had increased from fewer than 10,000 members in 1995 to some 300,000 in the year 2000, and to more than one million in 2005.

While the membership strength of the ruling CCM was not known, opposition parties were concerned that it had employed the administrative services of the state for more than 40 years to gain its membership strength. There was further concern that the ruling party could afford to pay its officials and staff much higher salaries than was the case with the opposition parties.

A study by Chaligha⁷ established that very few elite people join opposition parties, particularly at the early stages of these parties. All parties had clear criteria for recruiting new members and for the members' rights and obligations once they had joined. The details provided for the ruling party are broadly similar to those of the other parties.

CCM

Members are required to participate fully in party activities, to offer their opinions at party meetings, to take part in elections of leaders and other officials and to be elected to any vacant position in the party. Members may criticise the party and present their views at higher levels if they are not satisfied. They are also entitled to meet any of the party's leaders if they follow laid-down procedures.

People may join the party if they are above 18 years of age, are employed or are a peasant (farmer) and subscribe to the party's constitution. They must also respect other people, be prepared to cooperate with other people and let their actions and deeds be a role model for others. They must, in addition, be hard working and ready to advocate the party's ideology.

Chadema

Members pay fixed amounts in membership and annual fees but the exact amounts were not disclosed. However, most members cannot afford these fees.

TLP

Activists and other influential people are sometimes retained to recruit members. When identified by branch and other leaderships, these recruiting agents may receive small financial support in the form of food and transport allowances. This is especially the case for those with family commitments. A member who joins this party is required to pay TSh200 for his or her membership card plus an annual membership fee of TSh600.

COMMUNICATION WITH PARTY MEMBERS

Individual postal correspondence is the most frequent form of communication in the case of all parties except the CUF, which relies to a large extent on public rallies and meetings. Rallies are also used by the other parties, as are mobile phones and, to a smaller extent due to the limited access to computers, websites and email.

Members who have filed petitions against election results communicate with party leaders in order to receive administrative guidance and support. Although parties' constitutions and election manifestos are widely available, most party leaders said that few of their members read these regularly.

TRAINING

All four parties surveyed offer training to different categories of their membership, including the leadership, campaign volunteers, aspiring candidates, MPs and party officials.

Political training for candidates for senior positions in their parties or for public offices includes training in lobbying, advocacy and social and economic issues. There is also training on gender issues, good governance, multiparty politics, democracy, peace and security.

Civic education programmes for the general public and for women's and youth wings are sometimes offered in partnership with certain NGOs and civil society organisations (CSOs).

EXTERNAL RELATIONS

As the ruling party, the CCM has strong contacts with international organisations, but no details were available.

Chadema

The party communicates with the International Democrat Union (IDU) and has contacts with political parties in various countries, including the Conservative Party of the United Kingdom, the Center Party in Sweden, Kokomus in Finland, the NPP in Ghana, the DP in Kenya, Renamo in Mozambique and the UMP in Sri Lanka.

TLP

The party has 'friends' in the Scandinavian countries and in the United States (particularly the Democrats), who are supporting them. Since 2002 the Netherlands-based Institute for Multiparty Democracy has provided funds to the TLP for civic education training for its members and for capacity-building training for its leaders. The National Democratic Institute of America and the Foundation for Democracy in Africa have provided similar funding.

CUF

This party has contact only with the Liberal Democratic Party in the United Kingdom.

INTERNAL ALLIANCES

Parties have the right to form alliances without having to establish legal entities. Our respondents speculated that the reason for this might be the difficulty new parties have in establishing themselves with little, if any, state funding, which at present is provided in proportion to the votes cast for each party.

Attempts have been made to form coalitions among the opposition parties in an attempt to oust the ruling party. One of these was during the political crisis after the 2000 election in Zanzibar, when some 26 people were killed and several hundred fled the country as political refugees.

It was also reported that parties not included in our survey had formed an alliance to push for constitutional changes and a levelling of the playing field for all political parties. While the law requires the state to provide equal opportunities for all fully registered parties, state support goes mainly to the parties that are represented in parliament, and in proportion to their representation.

RELATIONS WITH THE ELECTORAL COMMISSION AND OBSERVERS

Our respondents reported that the parties work closely with the country's electoral commission, which was established after the reintroduction of multiparty democracy.

Chadema noted that the electoral commission is the official observer of its party's activities. The TLP also indicated that it has a formal relationship with the electoral commission, but said that the party is not happy with how the electoral commission operates, 'because it favours the ruling party rather than the opposition parties'.

RELATIONS WITH CIVIL SOCIETY ORGANISATIONS

Only the CCM, as the ruling party, has wide contacts with the majority of CSOs, including those in the rural areas. The party also participates in the outreach programmes of these CSOs.

Outreach programmes by opposition parties are limited by the parties' weak financial position, and their relations with these organisations and networks are nowhere near as strong as the CCM's. The CUF, indeed, said that it had no formal relations with any CSO or NGO.

However, the TLP and Chadema indicated they have formal relations with several NGOs, including Redet, the Eastern and Southern African Universities Research Programme, the Bunge Foundation, the Tanzania Gender Networking Programme and the Media Women's Association of Tanzania.

Chadema added that it worked closely with NGOs on issues related to civic education and debates on the state of democracy in Tanzania. For instance, for the past 13 years Redet has been organising annual conferences on the state of democracy in Tanzania, involving political parties, other NGOs and CSOs, and has also been conducting research and training from national to grassroots levels. What emerged from our interviews was that most parties do not consult with the general public on a regular basis.

MEDIA OUTLETS

In Tanzania, the electronic and print media make up the most important vehicle for communicating with the general public. The law gives political parties equal access to the media, with free airtime on public television and radio, and free space in government-owned newspapers.

The government owns two television and radio stations – one each on the Mainland and in Zanzibar – while there are at least five private television networks and twice that number of private radio stations. Tanzania also has more than 100 privately owned newspapers.

While no opposition party owns a television network, a few parties do own newspapers. These include a daily, Tanzania Daima, which is owned by the chairman of Chadema, and a weekly, Shaba, which is owned by the TLP. (At the time of our survey, however, Shaba was not being produced due to a lack of funds.)

The ruling party has the lion's share of the media, and opposition parties complain that they have an unequal access to the public electronic and print media.

GENDER EQUALITY

In 1995, the Commonwealth heads of state endorsed an action plan for the promotion of gender equality. Their governments were urged to introduce measures that would result in an immediate increase in the participation of women in politics. The target then was that the ratio of women to the total should be at least 30%. At national level, gender equality is reflected in the country's constitution.

In the context of political parties, however, no up-to-date information is available. This is not surprising, as the law governing parties discourages any emphasis on religion, ethnicity or gender. For the purposes of good governance, on the other hand, it seems important to have figures on the gender composition of parties, as well as other demographic data for their members, such as their region of origin, age, education, class and occupation and the priority needs of themselves and their families.

Respondents also indicated that, particularly at national level, men occupy all the leadership positions, giving the impression that political parties are men's clubs. At the time of the study and in all parties except Tadea, men filled the positions of party chairmen, secretary-generals, deputy secretary-generals, and publicity and information officers.

Also at committee level, men predominate, although the ruling party has taken some corrective action. Whereas all 21 members of its NEC were male in 1994, by 2002 there were eight women members of the enlarged, 39-member, NEC.

In Chadema, the TLP and the CUF women are grossly under-represented in these parties' NECs. In Chadema, for example, the head of the women's wing is the only woman in this party's 24-member NEC.

PARTY FUNDING

The 1992 Parties Act describes the following as the five main sources of funds for registered political parties:

- membership fees;
- voluntary contributions;
- the proceeds of any investment or project undertaken in which the party has an interest;
- subventions from the government; and
- donations and grants from any other sources.

Only the CCM has significant assets in the form of businesses or buildings.

The opposition parties rent buildings and some cars. The TLP noted, for example, that it owns two cars at its head office and a car in each of two regions, as well as 30 motorcycles and 231 bicycles (one for each constituency) and some public address systems. Fundraising strategies include:

- CUF: Property donated by members is auctioned at fundraising functions. Other activities include charity walks, dinners and lunches, and gala dances and festivals.
- TLP: This party asks for donations from friends outside the country.

- Chadema: This party receives donations from individuals, with the reservation, previously noted, that most businessmen are afraid to support opposition parties. Fundraising is also done through fliers and posters.

All parties indicated that their main expenditure goes on publicity and propaganda, salaries, transport, and research and meetings. No percentage breakdown for these various expenditure items was, however, available.

On paper, all parties are required by law to have their expenditure audited and their audited reports presented to party meetings. The CUF respondent indicated, however, that no regular financial reports were prepared but that, without mentioning the time frame, some audited reports were sent to the Registrar of Parties. The TLP respondent also indicated that no regular reports were prepared or made public, but that some audited reports were discussed by its NEC and forwarded to the Registrar of Parties. Of the parties surveyed, only Chadema prepared regular financial reports at all levels, submitted audited financial reports to its central committee and council for discussion and approval, and sent final reports to the Registrar of Parties.

No information was obtained on how parties spend their money. This was seen as a sensitive issue and one that most respondents were not ready to talk about at any length. Party candidates pay only token amounts for their nomination forms, and most party leaders noted that the majority of Tanzanian people are too poor to contribute significantly to party funds. This applies particularly to the opposition parties, including those we surveyed – the CUF, Chadema and the TLP.

CAMPAIGN FUNDING

As far as campaign funding is concerned, there were differences from party to party.

- CCM: This party has a solid funding base that allows it to distribute funds to the national, regional and district branch levels of the party.
- CUF: No funds are distributed from the central level, and individual candidates must bear all their own campaign costs.

- Chadema: This party's approach is different to the extent that candidates' campaign funding is discussed by the various party organs and distribution takes place according to the amount available. This party's total government funding subsidy is only US$5,000, which is not even adequate to cover daily running costs. Expecting candidates to raise money for their own campaigns becomes a major problem because 'most people at these levels do not have enough money for their own personal needs'. Indeed, 'most people at these levels are not sure about their next meal'.
- TLP: The party's NEC discusses campaign-funding requirements and allocates amounts according to party strength in the various areas and the quality of its candidates. Larger amounts go to areas where the competition is stiffer. Presidential candidates receive more than aspirant MPs. The exact amounts depend on the money available at the time of the election. This party's candidates are expected to raise campaign funds themselves and they may spend everything they collect without any party interference.

All parties

Regional and local parties are also expected to raise funds for their own campaigning purposes. This is because funds from the national level are never sufficient. When asked how much income was collected during the last election and non-election years, all the respondents noted that this was confidential information that was disclosed only to the relevant party committees and to the Registrar of Parties.

SUPPORT FOR WOMEN'S AND YOUTH WINGS

- CCM: This party's youth wing, which has some two million members throughout the country, is 100% supported by the senior party. It also receives income from its projects but the exact amount was not disclosed.
- Chadema: In the case of this party, no specific amount is allocated to either women's or youth wings because of the inadequate funding of the party.

- TLP: This party allocates 20% of the funds it receives from the Registrar of Parties to its women's wing and 10% to its youth wing. A further 10% goes to the elders of the party. All these wings or groups are also allowed to raise their own funds from any source.
- CUF: Both the women's and the youth wings of this party have their own income and also receive contributions from the membership, in the form of membership fees and annual contributions.

CONSTRAINTS, CHALLENGES AND OPPORTUNITIES

The development of democratic political systems in Tanzania faces a multitude of constraints, challenges and opportunities. Most of these require political will in order to change some rigid or dominant political cultures. This will also require general goodwill and may take a considerable length of time to fully achieve.

MUSHROOMING OF PARTIES

There is a growing concern that changes to Tanzania's political system may have been more the result of external factors than of internal forces. This view seems to be borne out by the way most of the political parties, and particularly the opposition parties, spend more time on party problems than they do on development issues. Also noticeable has been the readiness of some party leaders to rush to create new parties instead of addressing the weaknesses in their present parties. It is largely because of the personal ambitions of party leaders that the wind of democratisation is not yet benefiting the majority of Tanzanians.

LACK OF ENFORCEMENT

Most opposition leaders interviewed felt cheated by the political law. They felt that the ruling party was benefiting too much from government institutions such as the media and the electoral commission, and that the playing field was therefore not level.

PARTY FINANCING

Most opposition parties were facing financial problems and these affect the implementation of their party policies and programmes.

INTERFERENCE WITH PARTY ACTIVITIES

Most opposition parties felt that the ruling party was interfering with their activities, particularly when the opposition parties moved into areas where the ruling party had a strong base.

RELATIONSHIPS BETWEEN PARTIES

Overall, there is a serious problem with respect to relationships between parties. There is a perception that the ruling party and the government see the opposition parties and their leaders as enemies rather than as partners jointly responsible for the promotion of a democratic culture in Tanzania. Chadema, for example, indicated that it is not close to the CCM at all.

MEMBERSHIP

Opposition parties complained that some sections of the population, including the elite and business people, do not join their parties because they believe they may suffer negative consequences. They see some government actions as partisan, including directives aimed at preventing government employees from taking an active part in politics, and as ways of discouraging such people from joining opposition parties.

DISCONNECTED OR UNINFORMED PARTIES

Continuous conflicts between parties have led to some party leaders becoming isolated from the general public, which does not take politics as a serious business, with most people believing that politics is a dirty game.

SKEWED PARTY ASSISTANCE

It was alleged that for various reasons rich businessmen, in particular, support the ruling party and not the opposition.

CONFLICTING VIEWS ON ECONOMIC MANAGEMENT

Most opposition parties do not support or approve many of the steps taken by the government (under the ruling party) to reform the Tanzanian economy, and believe in particular that the privatisation and democratisation programmes have not gone far enough.

GENDER IMBALANCES

Despite efforts by the ruling party to address gender inequalities, these still persist. There is also a concern that the ruling party is putting more emphasis on the quantitative rather than on the qualitative aspects of gender equality.

LIMITED OR INADEQUATE FUNDING

There is hardly any financial support from the state for newly emerging parties, particularly those with no members of parliament. This accounts for the weak base of most parties.

CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

- ❑ The ruling party (the CCM) is content with the present state of democratisation in Tanzania. Most opposition parties, on the other hand, are dissatisfied with the democratisation process.
- ❑ The fragmentation and internal weakness of the opposition parties create a strong opportunity for the ruling party to continue in power for a considerable period of time.
- ❑ Unless opposition parties unite or form alliances in order to establish a few strong parties they will not be able to challenge the ruling party, even though many Tanzanians have lost confidence in the CCM due to conflicts within the party.
- ❑ There is need to improve the size, quality and internal functioning of the opposition parties. This will require a review of the conditions governing the registration of parties. The following proposals are made in this regard:
 - One or more neutral institutions should be created to deal with conflicts within and between political parties.
 - Sound financial guidelines need to be laid down for parties. These should include clear recommendations on ceilings for donations and on campaign spending.
 - Candidates aspiring to leadership positions such as the presidency of the country and MPs should be required to pay higher deposits or otherwise give proof of their 'success stories'.
 - Quotas for women should be raised to match the current AU norm of 50%. Some parties have been able to achieve this.
 - Regulations should be introduced for the financing of election campaigns, particularly those for the presidency. These should require parties to set funding limits for their campaigns and for all parties to establish a temporary election fund account with a bank (to be chosen by all parties) for all campaign-related activities. Procedures for reporting need to be established and all parties need to be required to draw and deposit monies into these accounts. Income and expenditure statements should be prepared, and audited reports on these should be made available to the public.

- Likewise, limits for individual donations to parties must be established.
- Additionally, the law should clearly define who is and who is not eligible to contribute money for political activities.
- Individuals or groups should also change the law to prohibit anonymous donations to parties.

ABOUT EISA

EISA is a not-for-profit and non-partisan non-governmental organisation which was established in 1996. Its core business is to provide technical assistance for capacity building of relevant government departments, electoral management bodies, political parties and civil society organisations operating in the democracy and governance field throughout the SADC region and beyond. Inspired by the various positive developments towards democratic governance in Africa as a whole and the SADC region in particular since the early 1990s, EISA aims to advance democratic values, practices and enhance the credibility of electoral processes. The ultimate goal is to assist countries in Africa and the SADC region to nurture and consolidate democratic governance. SADC countries have received enormous technical assistance and advice from EISA in building solid institutional foundations for democracy. This includes electoral system reforms; election monitoring and observation; constructive conflict management; strengthening of parliament and other democratic institutions; strengthening of political parties; capacity building for civil society organisations; deepening democratic local governance; and enhancing the institutional capacity of the election management bodies. EISA is currently the secretariat of the Electoral Commissions Forum (ECF) composed of electoral commissions in the SADC region and established in 1998. EISA is also the secretariat of the SADC Election Support Network (ESN) comprising election-related civil society organisations established in 1997.

VISION

Realisation of effective and sustainable democratic governance in Southern Africa and beyond.

MISSION

To strengthen electoral processes, democratic governance, human rights and democratic values through research, capacity building, advocacy and other strategically targeted interventions.

VALUES AND PRINCIPLES

Key values and principles of governance that EISA believes in include:

- Regular free and fair elections
- Promoting democratic values
- Respect for fundamental human rights
- Due process of law / rule of law
- Constructive management of conflict
- Political tolerance
- Inclusive multiparty democracy
- Popular participation
- Transparency
- Gender equality
- Accountability
- Promoting electoral norms and standards

OBJECTIVES

- To nurture and consolidate democratic governance
- To build institutional capacity of regional and local actors through research, education, training, information and technical advice
- To ensure representation and participation of minorities in the governance process
- To strive for gender equality in the governance process
- To strengthen civil society organisations in the interest of sustainable democratic practice, and
- To build collaborative partnerships with relevant stakeholders in the governance process.

PROGRAMMES

EISA's core business revolves around three main programmes namely: Conflict Management, Democracy and Electoral Education; Electoral and Political Processes; and Balloting and Electoral Services.

CONFLICT MANAGEMENT, DEMOCRACY AND ELECTORAL EDUCATION

This programme comprises various projects including voter education, democracy and human rights education; electoral observation; electoral staff training; electoral conflict management; capacity building; course design and citizen participation.

ELECTORAL AND POLITICAL PROCESSES

This programme addresses areas such as technical assistance for electoral commissions, civil society organisations and political parties; coordination of election observation and monitoring missions; working towards the establishment of electoral norms and standards for the SADC region and providing technical support to both the SADC-ECF and the SADC-ESN.

BALLOTING AND ELECTORAL SERVICES

The programme enhances the credibility and legitimacy of organisational elections by providing independent and impartial electoral administration, management and consultancy services. The key activities include managing elections for political parties, trade unions, pension funds, medical aid societies, etc.

EISA'S SPECIAL PROJECTS INCLUDE:

- Rule of Law, which examines issues related to justice and human rights;
- Local Government, which aims to promote community participation in governance; and
- Political Parties, which aims to promote party development at strategic, organisational and structural levels through youth empowerment, leadership development and development of party coalitions.

ABOUT IDEA

The International Institute for Democracy and Electoral Assistance (International IDEA) was set up in 1995 as an intergovernmental body located at the interface between researchers, practitioners and the donor community to promote dialogue, analyses and networking for the purpose of strengthening democratic processes and institutions. IDEA's current programmes cover three thematic areas: Electoral Processes, Democracy and Conflict Management, and Political Participation. IDEA's work in the area of electoral processes is the most developed and entails, among other things, the production of global knowledge and tools which cover issues such as electoral systems, representation and participation, and election administration. In 1997 IDEA produced a handbook on electoral systems which has been widely circulated and discussed and which informed electoral system reform processes in several countries. Recently, IDEA published the New IDEA Handbook on Electoral Design, adding material on the political context of electoral systems and the process of electoral system change to the explanation of different electoral systems and their effects contained in the original book.

This year (2005), IDEA is celebrating its 10th anniversary both at its headquarters in Stockholm, Sweden, and also at select venues around the world.

IDEA has an African office based in South Africa:
